ABOUT THE STATE

W. A. McDonald of Boston, has been tramping through this state gathering material for a story which will be published later in the New England Magazine, for which he writes. Mr. McDonald has been making the trip alone, carrying with him his camera.

The death of Henry Russell occurred Friday evening at the Fanny Allen hospital where he was taken about three days ago, suffering from the effects of an accident which resulted in hemorrhage of the lungs from which he died. The remains were sent to his home in Cambridge. He was 52 years of age and is survived by a wife and two children.

As the result of celebrating the Fourth of July on Mr. and Mrs. Edward Greenwood of Colchester, who was visiting friends in Winooski, was shot in the hand by some unknown boy with a toy pistol. The wound is in the fleshy part of the hand and is a serious one. Another accident happened to the young son of Arthur Delage, who was shot by a boy playmate in one eye as he was looking through a screen door. It is probable that the boy will lose the sight of his eye.

An automobile party consisting of J. A. Baker, J. A. Baker, Jr., Miss Alice Baker, Walter B. Baker and L. H. Dunnett, all of Housatonic, Tex., who are enroute from Houston to Loon Lake in the Adirondacks, stopped in Rutland Thursday night. They have made the entire trip in a Peerless car, the register showing 6,191 miles. The party has been on the road since May 13. After passing the remainder of the summer in the Adirondacks they will return home by automobile, going by a route different than that taken on the way north. In Texas each city registers automobiles instead of the state doing so as in the north, the Baker car bearing a Houston register.

credible figure of 148 degrees F. This case occurred in a hysterical fireman who had suffered a severe injury from a fall.

In the discussion which followed the report of this case among the members of the association Dr. Welch of Baltimore referred to a condition of hyperthermia that had come to his knowledge in which the temperature was recorded as 171 degrees F. Of course such exceedingly high temperatures are of only short duration or death would ensue.

Fever is not the only disturbance which may alter temperature. Certain conditions, especially those due to diseases like tuberculosis, acute alcoholism, melancolia, convalescence from fever, poisoning from various drugs, and so forth, may cause the bodily warmth to become subnormal. Injuries and surgical shock also originate the same effect. Starvation always induces a gradual fall.

Low temperatures are always dangerous, and unless a reaction quickly ensues, by aid of relief measures, a fatal termination may be expected. The lowest recorded during life that may be regarded as reliable is one reported by Duffy in which the thermometer registered 84 degrees F. Death ensued the following day.

The body, however, can withstand extreme cold more readily than it can extreme heat before the regulating center becomes disordered, and so, other things being equal, freezing to death is not as common in cold climates as sunstroke is in warm.

Refused to Accompany Her.
A noted German lyric soprano, who may as well be nameless here, as she is no longer before the public, developed in her later years a habit of singing out of tune. One night at a small company, being asked to sing, she promptly consented, and her hostess went to Otto Lessmann, the German critic, who was present, and said:

"Herr Lessmann, will you accompany Madam Blank?"
"With pleasure. Where is she going?"
"Why, to sing."
"No, pardon me, not there."—New York Tribune.

Joe Humphrey pulled to the shade of some trees overhanging the river bank and, with the card in his hand, gave himself up to wonder. What did the girl want anyway? What was she like? He had had girls in dozens thrown at him by designing mothers without feeling anything but repugnance. There was neither curiosity nor romance, and above all was wanting the excitement of the chase. If this girl was angling for a lover it was not him especially. She might spurn him on sight. Was she pretty or homely, bright or dull, modest or bold? And all the while he was conning over these queries there lay the little crescent of hair. He touched it with his finger.

He pulled back to the boat-house, climbed to a furnished upper room, where he kept writing materials, and inclosed the card with his own, on which he wrote: "Picked up this day of —, 190—. 'Cast your bread on the waters, and it shall be returned to you an hundredfold.'"

In due time he received a duplicate card with the inscription, "Better one gold dollar than a hundred copper pennies."

His reply: "No puny gold dollar represents the writer. He may rather be likened to a big silver coin. Your crescent of golden hair may have suggested your simile."

Her reply: "It's all the gold I have."

His reply: "I have only a heart of oak."

"That was the beginning of the end. The correspondence went on, Miss Whiting finally explaining that she was a poor girl with a stepmother and so one to love her. She had sent her card adrift hoping that it might change her life and make it happier. Supplementary to this Humphrey informed her that he was a poet whose verses were too far above the market to be acceptable to publishers, but he thought that together they might be happy in each other's love in a cottage and asked permission to call. It was granted, and he met the girl in a small house on a country road. She was dressed in calico, and he wore a woolen shirt under a threadbare suit.

A LOCK OF HAIR.

By KINGSLEY WELCH.

[Copyright, 1909, by American Press Association.]

"You are acting like a ninny, sir. I am very much disappointed in you."

The words were spoken by old Marshall Humphrey to his son Joe, who had reached the age of twenty-five, which his father considered ample to show that he was exactly what his father wished him to be. And what his father wished him to be was this: First, he should be devoted to business and predisposed to carry on the concern his father had built up; second, he should marry and bring forth a son, through whom all this growth of wealth could be transmitted. To the old man's chagrin, the boy would have nothing to do with the business and showed every symptom of becoming a confirmed bachelor. Since he was an only child he was old Mr. Humphrey's sole hope.

Joe Humphrey, matrimonially considered, was like a wild animal that needs to be caught and trained, after which it loves its master devotedly. Leaving his father to nurse his disappointment, he went to his boat-house, intending to have a pull in his single skiff boat on the river. Just as he was about to embark he saw something red dancing on the wavelets among some rushes near by. Getting into the boat, he gave a couple of strokes, seized the red thing and drew out a bottle of pickles, as he supposed, the red thing being sealing wax covering the cork. It was a pickle bottle, but no pickles. Breaking the seal, he shook out a card, on which was written, "Irma Whiting, aged eighteen years, six months and twenty days." Tucked to the card with a bit of thread was a lock of auburn hair in circular form. Below this was the address.

There was nothing to explain why the articles had been placed in the bottle. If there had been there would be no story. Nature has laid a number of traps to insure the propagation of the human species, but the one she keeps for a starter in difficult cases is curiosity. In this case the starter was Miss Whiting's card floating in a bottle without a reason given. The interest it excited was enhanced by the little crescent of hair.

Joe Humphrey pulled to the shade of some trees overhanging the river bank and, with the card in his hand, gave himself up to wonder. What did the girl want anyway? What was she like? He had had girls in dozens thrown at him by designing mothers without feeling anything but repugnance. There was neither curiosity nor romance, and above all was wanting the excitement of the chase. If this girl was angling for a lover it was not him especially. She might spurn him on sight. Was she pretty or homely, bright or dull, modest or bold?
